

Relics of Future's Past

A surreal landscape with dark, monolithic structures on a beach. The structures are made of dark, textured material, possibly wood or stone, and are scattered across a sandy beach. In the foreground, a person in a dark coat and hat stands with their back to the camera, looking towards the structures. The background shows a beach with waves and a hazy sky.

In the West, the human lifespan averages eighty to ninety years yet we live as though we are immortal. “Relics of Future’s Past” deals with our human inability to become aware of our limited lifespan and the consequences of our actions.

We take for granted technological advancement and believe progress is linear, it can only get better. Not so. Recent events have ushered in notions of the apocalyptic: covid, war, economic crisis, fires and floods caused by climate emergency, immigration, Brexit, the greed and corruption of big business and politicians. In our Anthropocene age, we have the power to make or break our civilization.

In this exhibition, through a mix of media, from paint and canvas to the Metaverse and NFT’s the artists deal with the idea of leaving things behind for future generations. What will be our Relics of Futures Past?
